

Amazon to roll out lockers at Repsol stations

E-commerce giant Amazon is set to install delivery lockers in some of Repsol's 4,000 petrol stations in Spain and Portugal over the next two months as a result of an agreement signed by the two companies, reports the Financial Times.

Repsol stations can provide convenient pick up and delivery points for online shoppers and online retailers respectively. Customers will receive a code from Amazon which will indicate from which locker they can pick up their order.

The service has been tested in some of Repsol's 320 sites in Italy and has been widely available in gas stations in the United States and at over 1,300 points in the United Kingdom.

In the last year Amazon has been expanding its partnerships with fuel and convenience retailers in order to provide easy pick-up locations and avoid customers having to wait at home for the parcel. Retailers, on the other hand, see parcel services as another way to attract customers to its stores and create loyalty.
