

Spain: Andamur adds three stations to its network

The fuelling company has now added five new sites since February across Spain.

Andamur continues to growth its network of stations with the incorporation of three new service areas in Madrid (Ganesha combustible), Cuenca (Área de Uclés) and Guadalajara (Área 117 Torremocha del campo). The sites join to the last two incorporations that were associated in February in Seville and Valencia.

With the first three additions, they increase their coverage in the central area of the peninsula. These locations are now added to the 23 service areas that Andamur users can access.

“In short, it is a significant proposal that is marked as an intention to continue growing in order to continue offering facilities to the driver,” said the company in a press release.

In total, there are 170 service stations distributed throughout nine European countries.