

Renergen and Total sign joint LNG marketing agreement

Emerging domestic natural gas and helium producer Renergen will start to market its LNG products through Total's service stations.

The company and Total South Africa Proprietary Limited (Total) have signed an agreement for the joint marketing and distribution of LNG.

Renergen is in the construction phase of South Africa's first commercial LNG plant, and is anticipating a turn-on date of the plant around the third quarter 2021. The customer base for the LNG will predominantly be logistics companies operating trucks along the main routes across the country, with a significant portion of the initial production already allocated to customers.

"We are proud to have partnered with a global forward-thinking energy company. Total has a big focus on sustainability and a proven track record in the LNG space, which was clearly an advantage. This agreement is intended to provide ideal filling locations for our customers along strategic routes across the country, and the union will create a powerful first mover advantage in this exciting space in South Africa," said CEO of Renergen, Stefano Marani.

"It is a proud moment for Total South Africa as it is yet another first for our company. Total is committed to better energy and with this partnership we are taking another step towards providing affordable, reliable and clean energy in line with our Climate Ambition to achieving carbon neutrality by 2050 together with society. We look forward to working together with Renergen to continue making a difference in South Africa," said Mariam Kane-Garcia, MD of Total South Africa.
