

CPH2 appoint Jon Duffy as new CEO

Duffy will join the UK developer and manufacturer of green hydrogen technologies on 1 September 2020.

Clean Power Hydrogen (CPH2), the UK hydrogen business, announced the appointment of Jon Duffy as the new CEO. Duffy will join CPH2 on 1 September 2020.

Jon Duffy “is a recognised expert in business growth strategies and delivery of results,” according to CPH2’s news release on the appointment.

CPH2 was started by Dr. Nigel Williamson, ex ITM Chief Engineer, and Joe Scott, an Irish based businessman and industrialist, in 2012 with the mission ‘to be the leading developer and manufacturer of green hydrogen technologies.’

“The future for hydrogen globally is enormous and to be able to lead a business that has the best technology in its sector is a privilege. The design and production talent in the organisation is incredible and we will build a truly world-class and world-scale business,” commented Jon.

“His strategic thinking and leadership qualities are exactly what we need as the business continues to rapidly develop and grow. We first met Jon 18 months ago when he helped formulate our then thinking. His clarity of thought, rigorous attention to detail, and people focus made him the obvious choice,” said CPH2 Technology Director, Dr. Nigel Williamson.
